The Scottish Greens have formally opted for separatism, but their decision to work "with Yes Scotland to set out a transformational vision for Scotland's society" creates huge uncertainty as to what would happen if Scots were so stupid as to separate from England.

BBC Scotlandshire has discovered that the various political parties, interest groups and individuals who make up the tiny "Yes Scotland" campaign do not share a single agenda.

They have different policies on a number of things and, consequently, claim that they cannot set out, in detail, every policy that will be adopted in an isolated Scotland over each month of the next 1,000 years.

Instead, they all repeat the ridiculous mantra that they want people in Scotland to decide what is best for that region, instead of relying on the better judgement and financial beneficence of Westminster.
