Before being struck down with HCV

Days after being infected with HCV

It has now been confirmed that the suspected outbreak of Humerus Clivo Virus (shoulder Slope Virus or HCV) has taken place, with its epicentre identified as the UK House of Commons.

First noted at last week's Prime Minister's questions, when David Cameron's head was below the lectern for all of the session. Parliamentary journalists were initially at a loss to explain this unusual occurrence.

Various reasons for his diminutive stance were put forward. Initially most of the hack pack believed Mr Cameron was on his knees in prayer after the latest polls, or was he perhaps attempting to attract the wife of pocket-sized speaker John Bercow.

However Nosy Parker of the Torygraph, famous for breaking the expenses scandal, was first to realise that due to HCV Mr Cameron had been unable to stand on the stricken Nick Clegg's shoulders.

First indications that Mr Clegg had been struck came during an interview with Mrs Clegg when she broke down in tears exclaiming: "He can't take the kids hiking this summer, the backpack keeps sliding off his shoulders"

There are of course far more serious consequences for the economy and the running of Britain. The HCV virus is thought to be carried and spread through the eating of fish eggs, and as 97% of all MPs are known to partake of large amounts of heavily subsidised caviar (eggs of the Sturgeon fish) in the various Parliamentary restaurants, it is expected that this plague will bring the country to its knees.

The first signs began to appear as the oil price fell. As was widely reported during the Scottish independence referendum, the broad shoulders of the UK would normally have swung into action and secured jobs in the far far North North East.

Unfortunately with the rapid spread of HCV the government will be unable to assist in any way whatsoever leaving the overpaid oil workers to shoulder the burden themselves.

Whilst there is no known cure for the complaint, researchers are hopeful that the introduction of another virus found amongst the working poor, unemployed and disabled, Ingens Umeris Virus (Massive Shoulders Virus or IUV) may counteract the HCV virus.

Dr Rich Smug-Meddi of Harley Street, a hunting companion of the Camerons, stated that: "At least the poor would be good for something other than lying in bed with the curtains drawn". Dr Smug-Medi stated that the plan was to station riot police at all food banks in order to round up carriers of IUV, and that he was confident that hunger would drive the poor into their hands, stating that they would be paid one tin of beans per pint of blood.
