Scottish Labour's health spokesperson has today warned that separation from the protective umbrella of the United Kingdom will see the reintroduction of nit nurses in schools north of the border and may result in draconian border quarantine measures to prevent Scotlandshire headlice infecting the rest of the UK.

Neil Findlay MSP commented: "Alex Salmond and the YES nationalists cannot protect Scotlandshire from the every present threat of headlice.

"Under devolution we have managed to rid our schools of nit nurses but they may have to be reintroduced in a separate Scotlandshire to deal with a potential new louse plague of biblical proportions.

"I've spoken to Jackie 'Honesty' Baillie about other possible health threats that may surface after a YES vote. She was quick to point out that the eradication of Smallpox from Scotlandshire happened under the Union but this disease might magically reappear and start to infect the people of a separate Scotlandshire.

“Say No Thanks to Nit Nurses! Say No Thanks to Smallpox! Say No Thanks to eternal Salmond rule!”

Labour’s Education spokesperson in the Scottish Parliament, Kezia Dugtail MSP, was quick to attack the record of the Scottish Government under Education Minister Mike Russell MSP.

With a grimace reminiscent of a haemorrhoid sufferer getting a rectal examination, Ms Dugtail scowled: “The Education Minister was born in England. It’s like OMG! How can a bloody foreigner, which is what Mike Russell will be under Salmond’s separation plan, stay in charge of educating Scottish children?

“Jackie ‘Honesty’ Baillie has passed me a leaked dossier that shows Mike Russell is the actual primary source of headlice, the patient zero so to speak, who will infect all our kids following separation.

“He has to go quickly! He has to go now! He has to take Salmond with him!”

During the Prime Minister’s visit to Scotland earlier this week, David Cameron announced a Westminster pledge to steal £500m from the Scottish block grant to spend on the protection of Scotland from Smallpox.
